

Noninvasive Prenatal Diagnosis of Congenital Adrenal Hyperplasia

If you or your family member has Congenital Adrenal Hyperplasia (CAH), and you are thinking of becoming pregnant, you may be interested in participating in a study that will help determine in early pregnancy whether your baby is a boy or a girl and whether he or she has CAH, just by testing the pregnant woman's blood. The study requires giving about one tablespoon of blood. For more information, please contact the research team of Dr. Maria I. New, MD at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine by calling 212-241-7847.
